

MORNING APPEAL.

Thursday, January 20 1887.

A CRUMBLING LAND MARK.

The intelligence that the old Bowers mansion is about to be dismantled and the cut stone taken to Reno will be received with regret by every old Nevada. The history of the old mansion is a part of the history of the State. It was built by Sandy Bowers years and years ago after he made a big strike in Comstock securities and nearly all the furnishings came from Europe.

Bowers was a liberal man and his wife, who afterwards became famous as the Washoe Seersess, was also full of hospitality, and for several years the place resounded with song, laughter and the whiz of champagne corks.

"I've money to feed the birds," was Bowers' way of putting it. This, of course, could not last long and presently the owners of the mansion had to run it as a public resort and finally it passed out of their hands. Sandy died and was buried along side of a pine tree on the mountain just back of the house, and now a man is credited with more curiosity than sense who will climb the steep path to look at it.

The years softened and toned down the mansion and the grounds until with its clambering ivy on the walls, tremulous slime on the fish ponds, and green moss on the basin of the fountain, it took on the look of some old English manor house, needing only the armorial bearings to complete the picture. There are few people in Nevada who have not spent an afternoon there in the years gone by with some gay picnic party followed by a jolly bath in the pond which was fed with warm water from natural springs. No days half so balmy as these and no sunshine was ever sifted through the Autumn leaves with such quick glints of gold as here on those dreamy afternoons when you held somebody's hand for a whole hour oblivious of the fact that you were sitting square on a blackberry pie and half the ants in Washoe county were climbing up your trouser's leg.

But now Thompson, that old iconoclast, has got his utilitarian grip on the building will knock out all its romance and fragrant memories by lugging the stone over to Reno and building a prosaic business house where he can get huge rents for it.

A VULGAR CORRESPONDENT

The Chronicle would make a ten strike if it cancelled the engagement of its Carson correspondent. His report of the Stewart reception contained a number of dull-witted and vulgar slurs upon the manner in which the Senator dispensed his hospitality and how the guests received it.

The newspaper has no right to cross any gentleman's threshold and invade his private parlor for the purpose of insulting him or his guests. A journal like the Chronicle should understand the social amenities better than to allow so low bred an article to creep into its columns. It is such stuff as contained in the Chronicle communication that gives the people of the coast the idea that Nevada is made up of bores and eads. Each newspaper that sends a correspondent to the Capitol during the session has a right to insist that its representatives shall have some little experience at least with people of passably good breeding.

The Postal Telegraph.

Now that the Postal Telegraph Company's lines are completed to San Francisco, many of the merchants and business men of the Comstock are discussing the probability of a branch line being extended up here within the near future. Judging by their conversation, all are heartily in favor of the extension, and when Mr. Mackay returns here there will be some interviews with him on the subject—Footlight.

The people of Carson would also pledge themselves to support this new line. Reno, Carson and Virginia City ought to give sufficient patronage to the line to make it pay and Mr. Mackay ought to run the wire to the spot where he got the means to engineer this great enterprise.
